International Summer School "Beyond the Battlefield"

Wars do not end when the weapons fall silent. Therefore, when dealing with war and armed conflict, it is necessary to consider their consequences. These can be divided broadly into the following three stages:

- The immediate impact of armed conflicts
- The mid- and long-term consequences of warfare
- The long-term consequences.

The social groups to be examined in detail include not only soldiers, but also non-combatants affected by war, for instance women and children. The summer school therefore aims to shed light on aspects of war that are less frequently depicted in historical sources.

Three main focal points will be explored:

The immediate consequences in the course of war

These include, above all, issues such as quartering, impoverishment, displacement, captivity, hostage-taking and enslavement. It is also revealing to examine the fate and support of war widows and orphans from social and everyday historical perspectives, as well as from a legal point of view. This perspective also highlights those population groups which, although not directly involved in the fighting, are nevertheless affected by war.

The medium- and long-term aftermath of war

Combatants and invalids are reintegrated into society, victory or memorial celebrations are held, and monuments are erected. In the postwar period, different societal discourses on victory and defeat also emerge. At the same time, there exist longer-term consequences, such as those resulting from military occupation; this may include the settlement of new groups (e.g. veterans), which can have significant repercussions for societies and may in turn lead to rebellions against the conquerors. The aftermath of war also encompasses its impact on natural and environmental conditions.

Effects of war on the collective formation of groups and territories

Long-term consequences include institutional and ideological transformations, such as changes in taxation or landholding or the emergence of new shared identities, as well as the construction of new fortifications and the adoption of new military technologies shaped by wartime experience.

The Summer School will include several thematic workshops, conducted by experts from Mainz University, the University of Cyprus and LEIZA (Leibniz-Zentrum für Archäologie). The workshop will consist of lectures and group work on relevant literature and source texts (in modern translation).

In addition, a number of short excursions in and around Mainz are planned.
